"It strikes one at first as being a peculiar decision, but when you look at it in all its phases it is only just. There are lots of things that a man is compelled to spend money on in order to keep his trade, that the house will not permit him to charge as expense, that are really nothing else but expenses.

are really nothing else but expenses.

"I had an incident of the kind once that broke me up pretty badly. I was in one of those towns that you will often find—too big for a village and too small for a city. I had a fine array of samples at the hotel and an engagement with a customer that afternoon to come up and look at them.

"Of course, we must have something to smoke while looking at the stock. The cigars sold at the hotel were vile, and I went to a wholesale concern and bought a box of cigars, the best I could get, and paid 29 cents aplece for them by the box. They were lovely. I took some out of the box, so that it wouldn't look as if they were bought for that occasion only, and waited for my man. He came. I gave him one of the cigars. He lit it, and puffed at it for a few moments, and then he said: "I suppose this is a Havana cigar?" That disgusted me with him at once. He continued: "You Eastern men all smoke these Havana cigars; now, for my part, I prefer a nice, light, domestic cigar, say about five cents. It smokes better."

"I sold him a bill of goods, but I couldn't make the house pay me back the $1459 I had spent for fifty 29-cent cigars. Yet it was a legitimate expense. Those things strike you as tough, don't they?"
